Chamber of Commerce

The President's Perspective

Regional Strength

The Chamber just recently participated in Great Northwest Day at the Capitol. This is a great event that brings people from our region together to advocate for issues of importance to Northwest Missouri. As part of the day, we heard from an analyst with the Missouri Extension Service about the regional economy. To say his insights were pessimistic might be an understatement, but no real surprise. Population is declining, young people are moving to the big cities, jobs are fewer and businesses in the rural areas have a hard time making it. The statistics paint a gloomy picture. But are we seeing the whole picture?

Discussions regarding Northwest Missouri remind me of the discussions about downtown St. Joseph when I arrived over 25 years ago. People at the time only saw downtown for what it had been, not what it could be. No, J.C. Penney and Western Auto were not coming back and sadly the Robidoux Hotel was gone, but St. Joseph had to change the paradigm of what downtown success looks like. Today downtown is defining success in a different way from the past and seeing the benefits of it.

I see a similar future for the rural areas of our region. Success will look different than it did in the past. While perhaps still to be defined, building on our natural strengths is certainly a way forward. The quality of life is excellent: low cost, good schools, friendly neighbors – the area is drawing a new breed of settler, those looking for a better place. Entrepreneurs, military, small business, retirees, people who choose to live here because they want to.

The workforce in the region is considered by many to be the best in the country; industrious, hard working and dependable. Just ask some of our local manufacturers, they will tell you. That said, we must find better ways to provide those who live in Northwest Missouri access to skills needed by modern manufacturers. Today a skilled workforce is the number one factor in attracting business.

Yes, if you think in terms of the past, regional economic indicators will point you in a downward direction. However, thinking in terms of what a new economy in the region might look like could point us toward long-term success. There is substantial strength to build on in Northwest Missouri, its people, its quality of life and the opportunity to build a new future in which everyone can share in the success.

Great Northwest Day at the Capitol

Ten state senators, 90 state representatives, 100 staff members and more than 25 state departments attended Great Northwest Day at the Capitol this year in addition to more than 300 people from Northwest Missouri counties. Eighty-seven attended from St. Joseph. Officials from Northwest Missouri's federal legislators offices also were in attendance. The goal of the event is for all parties to work together to pursue legislative priorities for Northwest Missouri.
